In Spring of 1976, President James Finlay S.J. announced that Fordham University was opening graduate programs at Marymount College in Tarrytown. Finlay told the New York Times, “There is no graduate school of social work in between Manhattan and Albany. We have found a complete lack of training in the field in this area.” In an effort to take the pressure off Fordham-Lincoln Center, the Schools of Graduate Education and Graduate Business Administration would offer master degrees at Tarrytown also.

The schools were conveniently located in North Hall on Neperan Road, next to the Student Parking lot. Fordham students could use the Marymount campus, including the Gloria Gaines Library for study, in addition to the university libraries at Rose Hill and Lin-
